

1000 Blank White Cards

(The Discordian Intelligence Agency Edition)

UPDATE: There are now two lovely mirrors here and here. Smoke is optional. Thanks, guys!

1000 Blank White Cards is a card game, the purpose of which is to create the cards you're playing with. The original version of the game was created by Nathan McQuillan of Madison, Wisconsin. I originally learned about that version of the game here, although that page hasn't been updated in a while.

This new edition of the game was created in late 2001 by Riff Conner, and has been extensively playtested by the Discordian Intelligence Agency - Riff Conner, Mark and Kelly Hennies, and David Youtz - along with various guest stars. Several ~~rules~~ guidelines have been added, for the purpose of giving it a more gamelike framework.

What You Need:

- * 3-6 players
- * A pen for each of them, preferably black. Don't use felt-tips - they soak right through the cards. Pilot Roller-Balls are great.
- * A bunch of... blank white cards. We use unlined index cards cut in half. You will need 40, 60, or 90 of them, depending on how many players you have and whether you've played before. It's also good to have some extras on hand.
- * If you have played before, you will need the stockpile of cards you had left over from the last game.

The Pre-Game Phase:

First, you need to set up the deck. If you have 3 or 4 players, put a stack of 20 blank cards in the middle of the table. (If you have 5 or 6 players, use 30.) Then, if you have played before, add 20 (or 30) random cards from the stockpile of previously-made cards. (If you haven't played before, add 20 or 30 more blanks instead.)

Then, pass some blanks out to the players. If there are 3 or 5 players, everyone gets 6; if 4 or 6, they get 5. Everyone will now take a few minutes to turn their blanks into actual cards (this will be explained later on). When everyone's finished, gather up their cards and add them to the deck. You now have either a 60 or 90 card deck, depending on the number of players. (Actually, if you're doing a 3-player game, you only have 58 cards in the deck. Anal-retentive gamers should feel free to add two more blanks.)

Shuffle the deck thoroughly. (Don't bother trying to actually shuffle them - they're too flimsy. Just spread them out on the table and push them around 'till they're well-mixed.) Deal out five cards to each player. Game on!

Playing the Game:

Play begins with the player to the dealer's left, and generally goes clockwise. On your turn, take the top card from the deck (assuming there are cards left in the deck), and then play a card from your hand. You can play a card either on yourself, on another player, or to the center of the table (in which case it affects all the players, including yourself). If the card has a point value or some other sort of lasting effect, it stays in front of the player it was played on (or in the middle of the table) until it is somehow nullified, discarded, or removed by another card. Otherwise, it is simply placed in the discard pile.

If you have a blank card in your hand, grasp your pen firmly and turn the blank into a playable card (we're getting to that). It's best to do this during the other players' turns, so as to hold up the game as little as possible.

If you cannot play a card (meaning you have no blanks, and none of the cards in your hand can be played in the current situation), then draw a second card from the deck and pass your turn. If you can't do this because there are no cards left in the deck, the game is over. Anyone with cards left in their hands can show them around before discarding them, and then the winner is determined.

Winning:

Total up the point value of the cards in front of you, and add the point values of any cards played to the center of the table. This is your score (and yes, it can be a negative number). The player with the highest score wins! Woo!

Epilogue:

After the game is over, you will have a large pile of cards. The next time you play, you'll be using a random selection of cards from this pile, so naturally you'll be wanting to whittle it down a bit so that only the best cards get re-used. This is what the Epilogue phase of the game is for.

Take all the cards from the game you just finished, as well as any previous cards that didn't get used, and spread them all out on the table, face-up. Then decide how large a stockpile you wish to keep. If this is only your first or second game, start with 30. If you've played several games, go to 60, and once you've played a whole lot of games and have lots of excellent cards, you can advance to a 90-card stockpile. Divide this number by the number of players you've got - we'll call the result "X". So for example, if you want to keep a 60-card stockpile, and there are five players at the table, X equals 12.

Each player then examines the collection of cards and selects their favorite X cards out of all of them.

You now have a stockpile, consisting of the best cards that the players have made so far. Whoever is given the task of storing them can snap a rubber band around the deck, and put it on a shelf in preparation for next time. The remaining cards can be thrown away, carefully archived in a huge library of three-ring binders, or baked into a tasty casserole - your choice.

Anatomy Of a Card:

Okay, now for the important bit, the bit you've all been waiting for: How To Create a Card.

Here's a sample card, with descriptions of its various parts.

	* First, a title. This is what the card is called. Yep. * Then, a picture of some sort. Artistic ability is not required; if you can do a stick-man, you're ready to go. (During one game, we had so many stick-men on the table, I was forced to implement a card called "Stick-Figure Genocide" to get rid of them all.) If you play a lot, you will discover that your artistic skills gradually improve. Well, your cartooning skills, anyway. * And finally, a description of what the card does. This can be a point value, some sort of instruction, or both, or neither.
--	---

Point values normally range from 100 to 1000, in 100-point increments, and can be either positive or negative. Other instructions can be pretty much anything: normal card game instructions (Lose a Turn, Draw Another Card, etc.), unusual instructions (Dance Like a Chicken On Fire), or something totally bizarre (Eat This Card For Absolutely No Psychedelic Effect).

And that's really all you need to know. Run with it!

Some more samples from our current stockpile (if I don't name an artist, it was me):

--	--	--

BRUCE WILLIS FAILS TO DESTROY THE ASTEROID AND EVERYBODY IS KILLED

EVERYONE LOSES 1500 POINTS

Knock Knock Joke

-300 points

Einsteins Moustache

+400 P

One of mine, from the very first game we played.

This is by Kelly, the only good artist among us. We tease her mercilessly about this card, because "Why did the chicken cross the road?" is not a knock-knock joke. She freely admits to having no idea what she was thinking at the time.

One of Dave's. The called "Einstein's (Pipe".

POWERPUFF GIRLS SAVE THE DAY!

+500PTS

TAKE ANOTHER TURN

Arse Thorns

you can't get rid of this by playing it -1000 POINTS (WHEN IN HAND)

SPAGHETTI BREAKFAST

-800 PTS

Stickers are fun, and the Powerpuff Grrrls kick ass.

An early one of Mark's. I love the expression on the guy's face.

"Spaghetti Breakfast slang/euphemism for Rape".

'Censored' boxes are because they're real draw, and hide things would have been very complicated indeed.

Hitler Built My Hot Rod!  +3rd Reich Points	Don't EAT the Dip  +500pts	Oh my  -1000 pts
"Dave, what are 'Third Reich Points'?" "You're not cleared for that information." "Well, how many do I get?" "You're not cleared for that information."	Another one of Kelly's - you can tell by the way the art is actually good. I have no idea what this card might be referring to, and I was afraid to ask.	Mark drew this in a inspiration. I don't what I like better - of surprise on the n or the very understa There's not even an exclamation point - this sort of thing h every day.
DAMN DIRTY APES TAKE OVER THE WORLD  ALL CARDS WITH MONKEYS ARE WORTH DOUBLE	3  3	PIKACHUTU (HIS NAME MEANS "THE FLESH OF YOUR I SHALL BE THE LINING")  THE AZTEC GOD OF CALLS HIS WRATH -500 PTS.
For some reason, this card keeps getting put back in the	"Is this worth three points?"	Few people are aware Pokemon was original

stockpile, but cards with monkeys almost never are. So this card gets played all the time, but never has any effect.	"No."	on legends of the 15 gods of war and death. Now you know.
--	-------	--

Commentary:

Q: Is winning important in this game?

A: Absolutely not at all. The whole thing is pretty arbitrary and random; in fact, it's almost impossible to win intentionally. Sure, you could make a card that says "+ 1 Hojillion Points" and play it on yourself, but how long do you think it will take another player to make a card that forces you to eat it? Agressive play simply doesn't work very well. The real object of the game is to draw silly pictures and have fun. Cheesy, yes, but true.

(If for some reason winning is important to you, try this: after the Epilogue is over, look through the stockpile. If there are more of your cards in there than anyone else's, then you really did win.)

So, that's 1000 Blank White Cards. I highly encourage you to try it out; if you do, please drop me a line and tell me what you thought. But please, don't send me scans of your favorite cards - it's just a Yahoo mailbox, and it's already pretty full. Post the cards on your webpage and send me the link instead.

Cheers,
--Riff

P.S. Hail Eris!

P.P.S. Check out 1kbwc artist Kelly's stie: Voodoo Velvet

P.P.P.S. If card games are your thing, check out this site: The Card Games Directory

(Just about everything on this page is Copyright 2002 By Nathan "Riff" Conner. Don't take it without asking, please and thank you.)